Life 3 Jovember 1967

Approved For Release 2005/01/27 : CIA-RDP75-00149R000700290014-2

SPECIAL REPORT

A Covey of Spies Is Flushed in Germany Societ agent Heinz Sütt (right) posed as a photograph

Societ agent Heinz Sütterlin (right) posed as a photographer fund of the good life. Spy Martin Marggraf (below) served embassy parties as "the perfect waiter."

A waiter, a janitar, a photographer and a secretary were charged with spying for the Soviet I nion in West Germany after the dramatic defection of highranking Soviet agent Yergeny Runge. This account of the latest cold war esports by UNE. Correspondent Michael Purham in Bonn and Une-Lave Corveyondent Jess Cook in Washington. Martin Marggraf was a waiter's waiter. He worked at the best restaurants in Bonn, and he was often in demand to serve at the cocktail parties and receptions which pass for evening entertainment in the diplomatic community of any capital city. "He is the perfect waiter," an employer said of him. "He sees nothing and he hears nothing."

This estimate, as it turned out, was ingenuous—and 100% wrong. On Oct. 11. Marggraf was arrested by the West German federal police and acensed of spying for the Soviet Union. The government charged that Marggraf not only saw and heard plenty with his own eyes and ears, but that he also had put electronic bugs at the diplomatic functions he served so imneceably.

peccably.

The arrest broke the most newsworthy espionage story in years.
Three other accused spies were picked up. Marggraf's brother-in-law, Leopold Pieschel, a janitor at the French military mission in Bonn; Heinz Sütterlin, who posed as a freelance photographer, and his wife Leonore, a well-placed secretary in the West German foreign office. They were all arrested within five hours after Lt. Colonel Yevgeny Yevgenyevich Runge, a high-ranking operative in the Soviet intelligence system, defected to the West with his wife and 8-year-old son.

Runge himself was the biggest catch of all. Posing as a jukebox salesman, he had directed an operation which had intercepted nearly every code, every piece of correspondence and every secret in the Bonn foreign office and in the French embassy. As soon as they crossed into

CONTINUED

An agent's assignment:

marry the secretary

SPYING Communication

West Berlin, U.S. agents rushed the Runges abound a plane for America and no wonder.

A stocky, 39-year old I krainiao of German extraction. Runge had worked for the Soviet KGB since 1949 and had spent 12 years in West Germany. The two nets he directed, the Marggraf-Pieschel operation in the French mission and that of the Stitterlins at the foreign office, apparently had no knowledge of each other. The Stitterlin net was the more produtable—so much so, in fact, that several years ago Runge was ordered to concentrate on that, turning the waiter and jamitor over to another agent.

Sometime prior to February of this year U.S. intelligence got onto Runge. He agreed to cooperate, but only if his wife and son were taken to the U.S. with him. Then, in February, he was transferred first to Fast Germany, then to Moscow, where he was given a citation for his accomplishments and put to work feetining fieldlying agents. Sometow, just how will have to wait for someone's declassified memoirs—the Russians were tricked into sending the whole family back to West Berlin, Then, exit Runge, and the swish of the net around the Sutterlins. Pieschel and the perfect waiter.

Poyscatching brings out one apmanship in governments. After Ringe's defection and the subsequent arrests, the Soviets in retabliation released an excerpt from a book purportedly written by a tornier CLA agent manned John Smith. Smith's book, according to the Moscow newspaper. Livenux Gazette, described 1—8 intelligence operations in India dining the 1950. The Soviets said he disfected to Russia. Though a John is smith did work in India for the State. 2 Department during that time, a 1—8, intelligence spokesman said he never worked for the CLA.

Runge, meanwhile was labeled an Turser upulous erminal. In the East German government. As for the printer Pieschel, his pile was to plutograph documents be found in a safe in the military section of the French embassy. Finding them was no problem: In duplicated, the safe key in 1958, Ordered to concentrate on documents with the highest XATO occurs, classifications, he photographici them with a sophisticated. Tribleway courses, which reconsispapers for us however ordered doing a presence of the horizontal body.

As a corner cameraman. Satterfincabore was free to plantagraph official functions (the the error defense exercise) for a star concerns indoor Burtus runssienties, it is no exp. seriet papers which his right known (right), a serietary in the West German foreign ministry, brought home during funch hour.

High-level spying at basement wages

SPYING CONTINUED

The most pathetic member of the gast was 30-year-old Leonore Sütterin. She had a high-security job in the foreign office's administrative section, and she was one of three women on the list the Soviets gave Heinz Sütterlin with instructions to seduce and of necessary—marry. Heinz followed orders, and he and Leonore got married in 1960. Shortly thereafter she was promoted to a better job, and with it went a key to the boss's safe. Beginning in 1962, she brought documents home at funchtime for her husband to photograph before she elimbed back into a Volkswagen and returned to work.

Leonore, whose code name was Leonore, whose code name was Lola, seemed nonplussed after her arrest, even after she learned the real reason Sütterlin had married her. She piked with guards and asked a lot of questions about prison routine. But

Not one relative showed up for the funeral of foreign office secrenary Leanore Sitterlin, who hanged berself after learning Sitterlin lead married her only to use her. within a week she tied her prison pajamas around her neek and hanged herself in her cell at Klingelpiitz prison in Cologne.

The Sütterlin-lived in a modern $30,000 six-room home which they tilled with antique furmiture (plus a framed photograph of Konrad Adenauer). A neighbor recalled that when Heinz was hospir alized recently. Leonore confessed that "if anything even happened to Heioz, I wouldn't be able to go on living." The neighbor assumed they we e happily married, but added, "She did seem to love him more than he loved her, but that's always the way with men, isn't it?" After their arrest neighbors noticed the seal of the estiminal police at the Sütterlins' door, but they thought it was a joke.

Despite the Sutterlins' prosperity, the espionage business was apparently not yery hierative for the Marggrafs and Pieschels, Marggraf and his wife, lived, with Mrs. Marggrafs mother and drove an old car. The Pieschels paid $20 a month to cent three dark, dank rooms on the ground floor of a 100-year-old house, and Mrs. Pieschel eleaned the staircase and sometimes neighbors' apartments for extra money. Marggraf's wife, soblocked by the news about her husband that she was under heavy sedation for several days afterward, described him as a perfect husband who 'bid everything around the house himself." even hanging wallpaper.

With an estimated 5,000 undercover agents at large in West Germany, the press and public are difficult to startle with spy stories. When it finally was made public, the Runge caseranked as or Iv a slight scandal. Leonore's suicide, however, made headlines. A German-American intelligence team is still adding up the damage in what a West German prosecutor has called "the most important case of espionage in the history of the federal republic."

It seems unlikely that any important AVTO secrets are still secret. But the most poigoant—and potentially dangerous—fact to emerge from the whole episode is that Leonore Sutterlin was only one of three women in sensitive places whom the Soviets believed vulnerable to ideological conversion by romance. That means there are at least two others at large.

> K lara Pieschel, whose juntor hisband spied for Russia, caused a stir at a 1965 French embussy reception by embracing the guest of honor. Konrad Adenauer (left).

